

Aerospace and satellite systems increasingly adopt multiprocessor architectures to support real time missions such as autonomous control. These modern schedulers manage the tasks at once within the same RTEMS kernel on the chosen hardware.

To address this gap we present a framework that characterizes workloads via reuse distance analysis and selects the most suitable scheduler for each mission in the end.

x a e